Rules of Frisian draughts (100) and FRYSK (5 men on 5 man, basic row)

- The game is played on the international draughts board (100 fields) in such a way, that the field in the left-bottom is dark. The game is played on the dark fields. White starts the game.
- A Man can be moved forward diagonally.
- A Man can jump in 8 directions; diagonally and also horizontally and vertically.
- A Man that reaches the other side will turn to a King. Another Man is put on top of it. (If a Man passes the last line during a strike, it will remain what it was: a Man).
- A King can be moved backward and forward diagonally as far as possible.
- A King can be moved three times in a row; after that the King has to be made free by a jump (If necessary by the same King) or by moving another Man or King. This restriction is cancelled if there are only Kings left in the game.
- A King can jump in 8 directions (also horizontally and vertically). The King does not have to be put right behind the Man that has been jumped over.
- Jumping over more Men takes precedence. Two Men have more value than one King does. One Man has less value than one King does.
- Jumping with a King takes precedence. If a King and a Man can jump over equal value, the King must do jumping; otherwise the higher value takes precedence.
- After jumping, the Men that have been jumped over must be removed from the board. While jumping, one is allowed to move over the same field more than once, but it is not permitted to move twice over the same Man.
- If one has two Kings and the opponent has one King, then the player with two Kings has 7 moves to finish the game. If he cannot win, it is a draw. If neither can win, it is a draw (each player has one King).
- The game is over (and won) when the opponent has no Man left or cannot move about any longer (he has been locked in).
